THE rumour given publicity to by a Northern contemporary to the effect that the Chinese are projecting an ocean steamship company, in connection with the China Merchants' Company now in existence is certainly rather | which commences to day, the offices of the startling. If it should turn out correct, the intelligence cannot but prove unwelcome to foreign shipowners. Already there is sufficient competition in the carrying trade, and any increase in it cannot fail to act to some extent detrimentally upon the profits of the various companies engaged in it. The Chinese would, too, prove formidable rivals, as far as the native shippers are concerned, at all events. They are content with small profits, and their expenses would be much less than those of foreigners. Further than this, however, native shippers would gain one great advantage by the establishment of such a line, as by it they would be brought in direct communication with principals at home. In view of the benefits likely to accrue, therefore, it is not at all surprising that the Chinese commercial community, who have never shown any lack of enterprise, should have thought of such an undertaking. In fact it did not require much prescience to see that before long Chinese energy would run into such a channel.

Unquestionably they have a perfect right to a good deal of capital, but this will no doubt House. he forthcoming. While, however, it will in a measure prejudicially affect the interests of foreign shipowners, the Chinese themselves will profit by the increased knowledge of and intercourse with Western nations which will thus be brought about. And in this way, too, | time, and that she is capable of making the we may reap some indirect advantages. for Nagasaki, and on our arrival there we shall tolegraph for orders. It is very likely that a war will be resolved upon." It would appear from this that there were at least some complications with Corea, and that it not amicably settled war would eventuate. There has for some time been ill-feeling between the two countries, owing chiefly to the neglect of Corea to pay tribute to Japan, and the younger people of the latter would not be averse to try their strength with such an antagonist. The military class is also still powerful, and it might possibly suit the Government to try the expedient of a foreign war to divert attention from civil troubles at

On the other hand the Nichi Nichi Shimis does not consider it altogether trustworthy, and that the possibility of a war with Corea has been exaggerated. At the same time it does not dispute that the intelligence possesses some foundation in fact. It then proceeds to consider the consequences to Japan of such a conflict. It bolieves that if the Government should be so ill-advised as to engage in war in the actual circumstances of the country the results would be disastrous. A civil war would be almost certain to break out, as there are many men notoriously disaffected to the existing régime who would eagerly seize the first opportunity to stir up rebellion. The chances of success, likewise, would probably obtain support from China. and though Japanese arms would doubtless prove victorious in the end, the net result would be a barren triumph. Finally it adpolicy of the Government. This is a sensible way of looking at the question, and by it the Japanese will do well to be guided. They have scarcely a sufficient pretext for commoneing hostilities with Corea, and they would be almost certain to become embroiled | intellect. with China also. The declaration of war with Corea might prove the inauguration of a long and serious conflict, during which the material progress and well-being of Japan would suffer greatly, and the country become involved in anarchy. SUPPOSED LOSS OF A SHIP AND ALL Luts on Wednesday night (June 23rd) the

A correspondent of the Englishman, writing under date of June 3rd, from the above place gives the following interesting description o his journey to it :- We seem to have reached the very end of things, the Ultima Thule of civilisation, and I believe the North Pole itself. would be welcome after ten days' abode in a Burman boat. Ours was of a moderate size, of about 300 baskets, the capacity being thus calculated in this country; and as the usual basket contains 66 pounds of rice, it will be conjectured there was not much room for promenading. The country, from the little we saw at first seemed scarcely attractive. The former part of our journey lay up the Pegu river, with a picturesque display of "kaing," or elephant grass; and nothing else, for about 50 miles on each bank. Thence we diverged through the floor to kies them. At that moment my heart was Kaynen creek, where we were entertained with cheerful ancedotes concerning the perils we were exposed to from the mighty bore which daily ascends the Gulf of Martaban. This mighty bore finally resolved itself into an ordimuddy water around us. Crossing the gulf, we passed into the Sittonng River, called also the Toungoo or Poungloung. The town of Sittoung, which lies on its left bank, was, under Burmese rule, a place of some importance, with extensive fortifications, which we found some difficulty in surmounting, and consequently demolished soon after our occupation. At present there is nothing remarkable to be seen, except a specially gaudy prayar, or shrine, on the top of the hill-which-overlooks the town. The scenery, however, became a little less monotonous as we progressed towards Shwegyen; the hills of the Sittoung watershed appearing west and north, though never approaching within ten miles of our water-way. Shwegyen, the sudder town of the district of that name, is between Rangoon and Toungoo, where it stands and banners of the value of £100. as a kind of balf way house. The view from the circuit-bungalow reminds one of a coupd'ail near Ulawater or Ambleside. Below runs the Shwegyen river, cool and limpid, from the neighbouring hills, and sparkling among its New Benares $565, no sales. Malwa, market golden sands, which give a title to the fown. It joins the Sittoung just beyond the furthest bend we see, and its water can be traced for some distance among the muddy waves of the larger stream. Sloping gently unwirds from the further bank ascend a range of emerald and violet tinted hills. .. There are no cyc-dazzling heights, no sheer precipitous abysses, but softly rounded masses clad with purple forests and green waving pastures, which stretch away in an endless ripple towards the far horizon, while in the valley beneath these nestie quaint Shan and Burmese homesteads, each with a garden and banana grove, and little plot for paddy or is as devious and mazy as Meander itself. took us five days to cover a distance of what would be about eighty miles in a bee-line. The total distance by bout from Rangoon to Toungoo is 288 miles. By the new road, which is in course of construction, it is barely 190. As we came up, the river was at its lowest point. and our boats had frequently to be dragged across the shallows. Our boatmen, like most of their countrymon, were a light-hearted, genial set of men, who worked at towing and poleing regularly twelve hours out of the twenty-four, except when the advent of a breeze gave them an opportunity for hoisting the sail. Their sole relaxation was gambling, which they indulged in with great vigor and perseverance. The villages in the Cayasu creek are infested by Chinese adventurers, who prey on the different craws passing up and down the Sittoung. It might be as well to extend the Gambling Act to this locality, and quarter a few police there, to see that its provisions are attended to, as there s generally a disturbance when troops are un their way to and from the frontier station. As we passed Ombin, a villige about six miles from Toungoo by road, and about twelve by river, we were told a story of a Birman trader who came up during the rains with a bout-load of goods, for sale, and passed the night at this village. which is notorious for it mosquitoes. He was so impressed by their lerce attacks that be offered to wager his wife, his boat, and all his merchandise that no one would be found bold enough to sleep all night without clothes or covering on the bamboo deck of his craft. A young man of the village you the bet, but generously returned the loser his wife. We were given to understand that his liberality was not duly appreciated by the ungrateful gambler. Tounguo, which we reacted on the eleventh day, lies on the right bank of the Sittonng, and is rather an improvement on the conventional type of mussal stations. The Hongkong Hotel Company's Shares-$55 per houses, like all Burman-built edifices, are erected on wooden piles, and thetehod with grass or bamboo. They are wretched specimens of architectural endeavour, and a decent English barn would be infinitely preferable to the majority of the tenements I have seen. The officers attached to the different regiments ordered up have been put to he greatest straits for want of a place to live it. They have already had to eject two civil/residents within cantonments, and even now you may find two or three subalterns in a kind of stable with burely room enough to turn round. The town itself is remarkably well laid out, with broad clear roads intersecting such other at right angles, and there are nond of the noisome by ways and squalid lance which infest the background of every Indian city. It contains about 10,000 inhabitants, but there is from for thrice the number. The greater portion of the town lies embraced in greenery, and is quite picturesque at this time of the year, when the trees are lue and verdant, and the houses are in their best repair, to resist the impending monsoon. Not long before the English occupied the country, Toungoo was the seat of a powerful kingdom. The capital was originally at Dingawadi, a village five miles from Toungoo, but was removed here by the last independent king, and the present fortifications constructed it bis command. Contrary to all expectations, that town was allowed to fall quietly into our hands at the close of the last war; and when it was finally determined to anucz the district, the walls were partially demolished. However, grass-covered piles of brick-work still encompass the town a mile on every side, and the Te Dollars. mont, as I hear, during the rains, affords capital forage to duck and teal.

THE FISHERMAN'S WIFE. It was summer-time and the dawning day Shone bright on the cliffs of our lonely bay, And my man went out in his boat to sea, To win the bread for his house and mo. The day went on-I remember it well-The rooms were filled with the salt sea-smell; And the sunlight came, like an angel good, Through the doors and windows that open stood I song and work'd with joy in my heart, For I hold that a wife should do her part And clean and brighten the house within, Praging the Lord to keep her from sin-

I had finish'd, and just sat down to rest. When I saw a cloud rise up in the west, And the moan of the sea grew lond on the rocks. And the galle flew landward in shricking flocks. Soon the wind blow loud from the hollow akies, And I watch'd the waves with frighten'd eyes, As they struggled and aprang at the cloud's black frown And clutching their broad wings, swept them down. Then I hurried out to the old pier-head,

Through the yard of the church, where lay the dead; And I wish'd that my man and I had died, And were quietly sleeping there, side by side. "Twas an evil wish-I rebuked it too: But one heart is weak where there should be two, And one voice alone grown weak in prayer, When it misses another so often there.

Well, I watch'd for hours in the bent and blow, Till all the light from the sky did go ; Then I turn'd heart sick from the fling of the fgam, And wrestled my way to my vacant home.

There the breath of the storm blew under the door, And I felt it whisper along the floor; And the clothes of my man, as they hong on the stand, Swing as if touch'd by a spirit hand. The lights I put in the window small, - Were blown into darkness one will all:

And I heard, as the whirling storm went by, Shricks as of souls about to die. I dropp'd to the ground with my hands on my face, For I fear'd to see tolne sight in the place; And I praved the Lord my soul to keep,

And He heard my prayer, and give me sleep. I leapt up at last; twas early dawn : I ran to the door—the storm was gone ; The morning star shone bright o'er the sea; And my man came home to his house and me. -Inner and Outer Life Poems. By Alfred Norris.

The influence of the physical organs on the mind in sleep is familiar to all students of mental physiology. Sensations unnoticed during the day may be sufficient to set up a train of ideas of definite character and vivid distinctness, and such sensations are especially effective when sudden and contrasted with those previously influencing the senserium. As Dr. Maudsley has pointed out the characters of the delusion may be so determined by the organ diseased as to be sometimes the earliest indication of a subsequent malady, which may thus seem to be foretold during the dream, which had appa-

Such an effect of an organic derangement on the brain is no doubt the explanation of the peculiar delusion of motion through the uir, which has lately furnished a daily contemporary with a subject for abundant correspondence. There is probably no one to whom the teeling of such pussive lecomotion is not common enough. No delusions are more vivid than those which, in the waking state, accomsensations. A subjective sense of movement, too sudden, too intense to allow at, once the consciousness to realize the contrary evidence of other senses, produces a conviction, sometimes invincible, of change of place in the individual or surrounding objects. It is, then, u matter of small surprise that when the other senses are in entire abeyance, as they are, for the most part, during sleep, a "swimming in the head "produces the distinct impression "levitation;" but beyond this the phenomenon has no significance, and is only interesting as a trum of ideas which can have no counterpart in any preceding physical experience, and as an instance of the novel associations which may be provoked by the action of a sensory centre uncontrolled by remembered experience or correcting sensations
